

Acknowledgments

Over the years I have been the fortunate recipient of the friendship and guidance of many talented individuals whom I met in my North/South travels. My training as an Argentinist began when Angela Dellepiane in New York pushed me toward graduate study. Years later, David Viñas in Minnesota invited me to audit his course on politics and literature; his brilliant claims about the materiality of texts have been a force that still keeps me going. When I began my career at Berkeley, I had the good luck to strike up a friendship with Tulio Halperin Donghi, not only a consummate historian and an insatiable reader of novels, but also my colleague and mentor for nearly forty years. He read an early draft of chapter 1 of this book, but I am indebted to him for much, much more.

A study trip to Argentina in order to check out the archives occurred at the end of my first year at Cal. There, in the storm of a terrible dictatorship, a group of young intellectuals came out to greet me and show me the lay of the land. Ricardo Piglia, Beatriz Sarlo, and Josefina Ludmer were my guides. Over the years and despite our disagreements, I have treasured their counsel and good words, and their willingness to engage with my work. On this last round and during his illness, Ricardo was alive with ideas, kept his good humor about politics and destiny, and even volunteered to be my writing coach for an all too sketchy novel; perhaps to my regret, I left the novel alone and finished this book instead. And then there has always been the irreplaceable Beba Eguía, leading me through the intricacies of Argentine life that I never could have seen on my own.

This book sparked many additional conversations, particularly among some of the writers and artists whose works are considered in these pages: thanks to Diamela Eltit, Guillermo Núñez, Nuno Ramos, Demian Schopf, and Raul Zurita, whose soaring talents in literature and the arts have inspired me to be a more demanding reader and to demand more of myself.

Adriana Amante has been a necessary and lively interlocutor regarding the Argentine archive and just about everything else. John King, my frequent e-mail pal, has shared with me a love for Latin American texts, avant-garde art, and gardens. His help at the last moment in locating some visual materials gave me a certain relief, but not as much as his reassuring words about more than a few of the pages here. Luis Cárcamo Huechante spent hours with me talking about the art of the voice so that sometimes we were left nearly speechless. Ksenija Bilbija, Nicole Caso, Tom McEnaney, Héctor Hoyos, and Ximena Briceño invited me to test my ideas through public lectures at their home institutions. Gwen Kirkpatrick and Diana Sorensen were implacable readers who generously went through the entire manuscript and gave thoughtful comments about ways to improve it. As always, I am in their debt for their intelligence and the long camaraderie that we share in the Latin American field.

In Argentina, Adriana Carreira and Silvina Marsimian kindly introduced me to the library collections of the Colegio Nacional; Juan Pablo Canala of the Biblioteca Nacional Mariano Moreno was generous with his time and materials. María Inés Lagos Pope gave me a venue for my work and allowed me to consult the Special Collections Division of the University of Virginia Library. UC Berkeley librarians Carlos Delgado and Claude Potts came to my rescue on multiple occasions. I also benefitted from the wonderful editors at the University of Texas Press: Theresa May, who encouraged this project from the start; Kerry Webb, who kept me on track; and Angelica López-Torres, who dealt patiently with my clumsy maneuvers through high-tech reproductions and pixels.

Finally, I am a beneficiary of the community that took shape around me at Berkeley. Several of my former students, now prominent scholars, read sections of this text and offered substantial comments: thanks to Munia Bhaumik, Anna Deeny, and Tom McEnaney at different stages of writing; to Chrissy Arce, Myrna García-Calderón, Víctor Goldgel Carballo, Sarah Moody, Regina Root, Sergio Waisman, and Sarah Wells, who were always ready to jump into the conversation whenever I needed an ear. The late Humberto Cruz was a loyal friend with a tireless appetite for literature and the visual arts. Graduate students Sebastião Macedo and Ariel Wind were especially helpful as research assistants, but more important for me were our ongoing conversations about the craft of good writing. Mayra Bottaro was there from the start. I am in her debt for her observations on several chapters of this text, her endless company in the archives, and her unfailing devotion to scholarship of the kind that we desperately need. And then there are my colleagues to whom I am always grateful: Victoria Kahn, for her intellectual rigor and adamant good cheer; Robert Kaufman, for his relentless faith in the critical power of poetry; Daylet Domínguez, whose passion for nineteenth-century Cuba rekindled my own love for that field; Dru Dougherty, for his eye for detail while he read through chapter 3; Catherine Gallagher and Martin Jay, who were generous readers of draft material underlying chapter 1; and Teresa Stojkov, whose thoughts about different versions of this book were always right on target.

Last but not least, I can never sufficiently acknowledge the lifeline that was thrown to me by Maryann Wolfe as she put her needle-fine critical eye to many of the manuscript pages. I thank her for her patience and trials of endurance as I brought this manuscript to a close. Maryann and two of my favorite people, Joseph Manoleas and Lindsey Signorelli, give me sustenance, joy, and laughter, and above all, faith in the future.

THE SENSES OF DEMOCRACY

THIS PAGE INTENTIONALLY LEFT BLANK