

Acknowledgments

Many individuals have contributed to the publication of this work. First and foremost are students at the University of Texas–Pan American who have participated in the interview projects. Those whose stories were gleaned from ethnographic interviews, and who permitted us to use their names, are listed in Appendix B.

The chapters in this work, more than in Batos, Bolillos, Pochos, and Pelados, represent the work of many graduate students at UT-PA, ten of whom are listed as chapter coauthors. Countless others, however, contributed by reviewing the chapter drafts, making suggestions, and permitting portions of their seminar papers to be included. Ruth Lopez, Priti Verma, Sandra Rodriquez, Cristina De Juana, and Ana Leos all worked as graduate research assistants, helping to organize and archive all the interview materials in a way that made them accessible for this and other publications. Cynthia Garza, secretary for the Sociology Department, also provided valuable assistance in coordinating many of the administrative details involved in maintaining the Borderlife Project.

Several colleagues at UT Pan American have contributed greatly to this publication. Drs. José Pagán and Cynthia Brown, both directors of the Center for Border Economic Studies (CBEST), not only provided funding for three important research projects included in this volume, but gave invaluable comments on many portions of the manuscript. Much of the funding provided by CBEST, as well as additional academic support, was made possible by Roland Arriola, vice president for External Affairs at UT-PA. Dr. Miguel Nevarez, former president of UT-PA, also provided economic support at key times for the Borderlife Project. Countless other colleagues at this university and elsewhere have provided constructive criticism.

We are especially indebted to Theresa May, executive editor of the University of Texas Press, who gave valuable encouragement for the project from the early stages of writing through the reviewing and editing. Her suggestions were always timely and valuable.
