ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

would first like to thank the directors and staff of two libraries whose policies and collections made this effort possible. At Clark University's Goddard Library, under the able watch of University Librarian Susan Baughman, the Inter-Library Loan and Research Desk mainstays Mary Hartman, Ed McDermott, and Irene Walch offered constant support and remarkable patience, particularly when I would approach with yet another handful of pink and yellow slips. Sue Baughman's vision of what a library should be encourages all faculty to take full advantage of current technology. I thank also Laura Gutiérrez Witt, director of the Nettie Lee Benson Latin American Collection at the University of Texas at Austin, for her open-stacks policy and for the generous photocopying grant I was awarded. The library's massive collection and helpful staff made repeat visits inevitable.

Without the unwavering support and generous spirit of Theresa May, executive editor and assistant director of the University of Texas Press, this book could not have been completed. Theresa has the special skill of being able to offer encouragement without applying pressure, knowing precisely when to offer a kind word.

I will always be in the debt of José Amor y Vázquez, professor emeritus of Brown University, who directed my doctoral dissertation. Pepe initiated my fascination with fragmentation by randomly assigning Juan José Arreola's La feria (The Fair) as my first oral report in his graduate seminar on the Mexican novel. Thanks too to Geoffrey Ribbans and Inge Crossman for their useful suggestions as readers for the dissertation. A more recent mentor is John Brushwood, whom I met at a conference on Mexican literature. I enjoyed our conversations in Mexico City when we coincided in our book acquisitions. Both John and Carolyn Brushwood provided lively conversation and warm hospitality.

I am most fortunate to have received constant support from colleagues and friends. In particular, I must mention John Conron, who read early versions of dissertation chapters and helped me focus my thoughts as the vastness of the final project became clear. It would be impossible to mention everyone, but I would like to name María Acosta Cruz, Dorothy Escribano, Bill Ferguson, Nancy Ferguson, Ken Hughes, Marsha Kinder, Rose Masiello, Cathie Spingler, Michael Spingler, and Virginia Vaughan. Our department staff, Joanne Berg and Florence Resnick, have been more than generous with their emotional and technical support. I appreciate also conversations with the many fine students it has been my privilege to teach at Clark.

I have received grants from the Faculty Development Board and from the Higgins School for the Humanities at Clark University that have allowed me to continue my research in Mexico and to travel to the Benson Library. I would also like to acknowledge my gratitude to Alice Higgins and to the late Nettie Lee Benson for their support of the Humanities.

Finally. I wish to thank my friend. colleague, and husband, Marvin D'Lugo, for his unwavering support and understanding and for having established a model of excellence that I have attempted to emulate.
