

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

George W. Brackenridge destroyed some of his personal papers before his death, and the others vanished under puzzling circumstances. Thus, the writing of his biography has presented peculiar difficulties, and I am deeply indebted to those who lent assistance.

Especially am I indebted to Gilbert W. Denman, Jr., president of the George W. Brackenridge Foundation, whose family for three generations has been associated with Brackenridge enterprises and whose help and suggestions have been vital. Others in the banking institutions founded by Brackenridge have also gone beyond the call of duty in assisting. Dorsey D. Hopwood, president of the First National Bank of San Antonio, formerly the San Antonio National Bank, opened the old records and archives of the bank, and Mabel Lohman searched through them for pertinent material. Ben Scholl, Robert Neal, and George List contributed personal reminiscences of Brackenridge's banking career, as did the late Roland Springall of the San Antonio Bank and Trust Company.

Johnowene Brackenridge Crutcher Menger, a descendant of Brackenridge's brother, rendered invaluable aid in regard to her family history. She shared the results of her extensive genealogical research and made available the collection of material that formed the basis of her master's thesis on her aunt, Mary Eleanor Brackenridge.

Other generous contributors were Brownson and Louise Malsch, authorities on the history of Jackson County. They not only shared their knowledge but also guided me to the old Brackenridge cemetery and to Mrs. O. H. Staples, who supplied a photograph of the Brackenridge home built near Texana in the 1850's.

Claire B. Cramer of Los Altos, California, executrix of the estate of Georgina Brackenridge Spooner Burke, also supplied essential information. She searched through old files left in her custody to find letters, a diary, and photographs that filled a void in the biography. These she sent to me with the request that they be deposited in the archives of the University of Texas upon completion of the book.

Another valuable body of material was contributed by Ronald B. Jager of Southwest Texas State University, who once considered writing a biography of Brackenridge but abandoned the idea. Especially helpful were his taped interviews with the following, whom I also wish to thank: Katherine Franklin Hart, daughter of Brackenridge's attorney and friend; Isabella Mathews McIntyre, Brackenridge's niece; Eugene Brackenridge, a kinsman; Zulime Herff Simpson, daughter of Brackenridge's banking associate; C. Stanley Banks, San Antonio businessman and historian; and James Pearson Newcomb, descendant of Brackenridge's contemporary of the same name.

For additional material or suggestions I am indebted to the following: to Chauncey Stillman of New York for information and a photograph of Charles Stillman; to Ralph Yarborough for taking time from his busy career in the United States Senate to supply an anecdote of Brackenridge's Civil War career; to John Pilkington of the University of Mississippi for a Brackenridge story he discovered while researching in another field; to Carol King of San Antonio for her reminiscences of her aunt, Dr. Mary C. Harper; to Waldine Tauch, sculptress and protégé of Pompeo Coppini, for her recollections of the Brackenridge era; to Ken Ragsdale for his notes of an interview with a Brackenridge associate, Atlee B. Ayres; to Houston H. Harte, Jr., of the San Antonio Express for help in the search—alas, futile—for the lost Brackenridge papers; to Walter E. Long of Austin for sharing his personal knowledge of Brackenridge's dream of a larger campus for the University of Texas; and to Dick McCracken of Incarnate Word College for photographs of Brackenridge Villa.

Like all others who engage in historical research, I am under obligation to a host of competent librarians. Katherine Hart and her staff of the Austin–Travis County Collection, Austin Public Library, made research a pleasure both by their courtesy and by the thorough indexing of their manuscript collections. Janell Jensen of Houghton Library, Harvard University, searched through manuscript collections for Brackenridge material, as did Albert U. Blair of the National Archives. Catherine W. McDowell of the Alamo Library and Marie Berry of the San Antonio Public Library guided me to material related to their city. Llerena Friend and Mary Beth Fleischer of the University of Texas Library, as is their custom, shared their wide knowledge of Texas history.

Finally, a word of appreciation is due my husband, Dale, and son, Mark, who braved the brambles of Jackson County in search of George W. Brackenridge's grave and endured the dust of several archives as I searched for the man.
