ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Lamily, friends, and colleagues have contributed to the writing of this book by being listeners and interlocutors, and also by providing the practical help without which writing cannot take place. Foremost is my mother, Marta Sorensen, whose devotion and support have smoothed many wrinkles along the way. My father, Gerardo Sorensen, has always been the ultimate reading partner. To Jim Goodrich, the deepest thanks for his loyalty, kindness and companionship.

Throughout the writing of this book I profited enormously from the intelligent and generous attention offered by Sylvia Molloy. She has followed its progress with continuous support, and I am greatly indebted to her for her friendship and the shared passion for Sarmiento and his world. Josefina Ludmer, Ana María Barrenechea, and Walter Mignolo also offered helpful leads when the idea of this project was taking shape. My colleague Ann Wightman has been a most valued interlocutor throughout the years, at times helping me think through some questions from her vantage point as a historian. The same could be said about Jay Winter, whose sense of history and poetry furthered my dialogue with the past. To Wilfrido Corral, many thanks for his unfailing and generous bibliographical expertise. Arcadio Díaz Quiñones and David William Foster offered most valued readings of the manuscript, for which I am deeply grateful. Over the years, I have had stimulating and sometimes heated conversations about Sarmiento with Joseph T. Criscenti, Elizabeth Garrels, Marina Kaplan, and Doris Sommer. I hope the following pages spark many more.

The research and writing of this book were aided by a Fulbright Fellowship, a Rockefeller Foundation Fellowship, and a semester at Wesleyan University's Center for the Humanities. I am indebted to their support, which provided essential access to research materials as well as the equally necessary peace and concentration. In Argentina, Adriana de Muro from the Museo Histórico Sarmiento went beyond the call of duty to allow me to access the valuable materials under her supervision. Many thanks for her kindness and efficiency. My friend Dr. Eduardo Duek worked miracles to obtain microfiches from Chile's Biblioteca Nacional. Theresa J. May from the University of Texas Press lent her gracious and professional support throughout.

My colleagues and students at Wesleyan University deserve my gratitude for their interest in my work and the intellectual stimulation they provide: I can always count on the generously intelligent input of Peter Dunn, Bernardo Antonio González, Robert Conn, and Khachig Tololyan. Joan Jurale, Edmund Rubacha, and Steven Lebergott at Olin Memorial Library have lent their expertise and support on many crucial occasions. Thanks go to all whose fingerprints are present on the following pages; may I have the good fortune to have put their traces to occasional good use. I dedicate this book to my daughter, Lisa K. Goodrich, who keeps teaching me.

SARMIENTO

Del tiempo que es después, antes, ahora, Sarmiento el soñador sigue soñándonos.
