One of the benefits of returning to this book project after some fifteen years is that it has reminded me of the great affection I feel for Moquegua as place, and for the many individuals who assisted me at various stages of research. First I thank Mike Moseley for inviting me to Peru in the first place. I greatly appreciate his assistance and encouragement, and his visits in the field were always instructive.

The activities of the Moquegua Bodegas Project were carried out within Programa Contisuyo, a joint archaeological program sponsored in Peru through the auspices of the Museo Peruano de Ciencias de la Salud, Dr. Fernando Cabieses, Director. Permits for excavation were authorized by the Comisión Nacional de Arqueología and the Instituto Nacional de Cultura in Lima, under Resoluciones Supremas nos. 176-86ED, 322-88ED, 236-88ED, and 34-89ED. I am grateful to these institutions for granting the necessary permissions for this project.

During the six-year course of the Moquegua Bodegas Project, a number of entities in the United States provided funds for research. The 1985 and 1986 surveys were supported by the Division of Sponsored Research and the Latin American Studies Center at the University of Florida, the Wentworth Foundation of Clearwater, Florida, and the National Geographic Society (research grant no. 3256-086). Excavations and mapping of the wine hacienda sites during the 1987 through 1989 field seasons, as well as analysis during the 1990 field season, were funded by the National Endowment for the Humanities (grant no. RO-21477-87) as part of its Columbian Quincentenary initiative, and by the National Geographic Society (research grant nos. 3566-87 and 4065-89). I am indebted to all these institutions for their support. In addition, graduate students working with the project were funded by the University of Florida (Latin American Studies Center and Department of Anthropology), the University of Chicago, Sigma Xi, and the National Science Foundation Dissertation Improvement Grant program (BNS-9020973 to Elizabeth Wing and Susan deFrance).

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Several companies and agencies in Moquegua provided valuable cooperation and logistical support for members of the project over the years, and I want to express my personal gratitude. The Southern Peru Copper Corporation (SPCC) provided project personnel with housing, meals, transportation, vehicles, maintenance, introductions, and continuing interest in our work, without all of which our studies would have been significantly less successful. In addition, the Corporación Departamental del Desarrollo de Moquegua (CORDEM), Concejo Provincial, Departamento de Educación, Escuela Técnica, Ministerio de Agricultura, CIPA IX, and 3ª División Blindada del Ejército Peruano contributed vital assistance at various times during our surveys and excavations.

Institutional support is crucial, but at the same time it is individuals who make the difference in the success of a project. Work in Moquegua was aided substantially by many wonderful people who unfailingly provided friendship and problem-solving capabilities whenever the going got rough. Chief among them were Antonio Biondi, who introduced us to the pisco brandy industry from the vineyard to the factory to the bottle and graciously granted us permission to excavate at Chinchá bodega on his land; and Germán Morón of SPCC, who drove us around to visit sites and for six years patiently provided logistical support no matter how importunate the request or inane the question. I am exceptionally grateful to these gentlemen. Other kind and helpful individuals in Lima and Moquegua include Walter Preble and the late Victor Barua of SPCC; Carlos López of Enturperu; Julio Biondi, who rented us project housing in Moquegua; and Alberto Villegas, who gave us several tours of his active bodega and generous samples of its products. Harm de Blij's enthusiasm for things southern and vinous was a source of encouragement and inspiration, and I cannot thank him enough.

A very special debt is owed to Luis K. (Lucho) Watanabe, Peruvian co-director of Programa Contisuyo, who coped heroically, often twenty-four hours a day, with the continuous demands of local public relations, changing national permitting regulations, and gringo frustrations. Gloria Salinas Portugal maintained the project house in Moquegua and regularly ran interference for us, and I greatly enjoyed her friendship. Marcelo Arroyo joined us in the field during the 1987 season, and we all valued his contributions and insights. Lorenzo Huertas and Leonor López did yeoman service in the archives; without their transcriptions this history of Moquegua could never have been written and I am most appreciative of their efforts. John Jones's analysis of our botanical remains in 1989 was welcomed by all. Hugo Ludeña visited us all too briefly in the field and provided counsel on colonial history. Ann Cordell contributed preliminary petrographic analysis of tinaja and botija fragments. And finally, the owners and residents of Moquegua's bodega sites deserve heartfelt thanks for politely (albeit skeptically) enduring the disruptions brought by our work as we tramped through their fields, probed into their homes, and counted and measured the buildings and tinajas in their yards. I do NOT, however, thank their accursed, vicious dogs . . . although trying to knock them off the side of the road was jolly good fun.

Without the labor of a dedicated group of hardworking graduate students between 1985 and 1990, this project would not have existed. I warmly thank Donna Ruhl, who assisted me in the initial surveys in 1985 and 1986, and Greg Charles Smith, who supervised field and laboratory operations in Moquegua from 1987 to 1990; others (in alphabetical order) include Peter Bürgi, Chris Clement, Susan deFrance, Sara Van Beck, and Mary Van Buren. Students, friends, and colleagues, but above all my pollitos, the “Badilejos Flamantes” got the work done, taught their Mama Gallina a good deal, and provided me with endless good times. I am grateful beyond words.

At the University of Florida and SIUC I had the pleasure of working with Ignacio Avellaneda and Gilberto F. Pineda, respectively, who volunteered their translation services for the archival documents López and Huertas transcribed for me. I have depended heavily on the Interlibrary Loan Services of Morris Library and their promptness regularly delights me. As always, I am grateful to Don for his skills with computer illustration, and to the six greatest feline fuzz-therapists east of the Mississippi.
