

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

For nearly two years this book has been our focus of research, travel, analysis, and writing. Our research effort has required continual intellectual and moral support, and we have been blessed to have so many willing to assist us with this project.

No one contributed more to the development of this book than the members of the Cocaine Outreach and Recovery Program. The research involved in writing this book is connected to African American people who are struggling to find hope, healing, and recovery from the disease of chemical dependency. At the Program we were assisted by members whose honesty and openness about their addiction added invaluable insights to this manuscript. They also contributed to numerous interviews, while offering thoughts and experiences critical to the construction of the book. We appreciate the willingness of the young African Americans confined to juvenile detention who consented to talk with us about their drug use and gang involvement. We also wish to recognize those individuals in recovery from drug use that we interviewed in programs in Seattle, San Francisco, Atlanta, Philadelphia, and New York City.

As we put this research into book form we were fortunate to have the assistance of two excellent editors. Beginning with the early drafts, Theresa May at the University of Texas Press provided the initial editing and intellectual support that facilitated the literary quality of the book. At the same time we received constant encouragement and direction from Lois Rankin at the Press, who provided the detailed reading, analysis, and editing needed for the manuscript.

For their steady assistance and support throughout the research and writing of this book, we also thank the staff of the Alcohol and Drug Abuse Institute, a research center at the University of Washington, and the College of Education. We are particularly grateful to Dr. Barbara Wallace at Columbia University, Dr. David Moore at Olympic Counseling Services, and Dr. John Wallace for their constant intellectual contributions and moral support, as well as that offered by our friends and families.

We received much-needed spiritual support and blessings from the Reverend Samuel Berry McKinney at Mt. Zion Baptist Church in Seattle and from the Reverend Cecil Williams at Glide Memorial Methodist Church in San Francisco. In Philadelphia the Reverend Arlene Churn provided guidance, insight, and warm support.

Given the nature of this book, it was critical to gain the insights of those with particular knowledge of each drug and its impact on African Americans. For the chapter on alcohol use, we are especially grateful to several war veterans and members of Alcoholics Anonymous for sharing their experiences from the 1950s onward. The chapter on cigarettes and marijuana and that on gangs were greatly enhanced by the help given to us by young people in public school or juvenile detention and by members of Marijuana Anonymous. For the chapters on opium and cocaine, we owe a debt of gratitude to members of Cocaine Anonymous and Narcotics Anonymous groups and those African Americans who consented to interviews for our research.

These acknowledgments barely reach the many African American individuals and families who helped with this project. But at the end of the process, we feel the most gratitude for our families, who stood by us throughout the length of the project. In this regard, we would like to thank especially Phyllis Johnson-Schmidt, mother of Stephen Lloyd Johnson, and Cleo Molina, wife of William Henry James, for putting up with us through this both arduous and exciting project. Without our family support, we probably would have abandoned this project at one of the numerous turns in the road on the way to completion.
