Many people helped me write this book. I am grateful to the presidents of religious orders who cooperated in giving me organizational data and who provided lists of former nuns. To those women, in and out of orders, who spent hours talking to me about their experiences I owe special thanks. In many ways, they provided the insights that helped me interpret the story hidden in the organizational statistics.

Professor Paul Ritterband has put more tedious hours into this book than I dare tally. From the time I first conceived the idea of conducting a sociological study of religious orders to the last draft of the manuscript, he provided suggestions and raised many questions that necessitated my exploring the data from new perspectives. His encouragement kept me plodding on in moments when I felt I was drowning in material. Professor Robert K. Merton has had profound influence on my thinking, both as a stimulating teacher and during conversations with him about the changes occurring in religious orders. His way of musing about an issue and raising intriguing questions helped me formulate some of the theoretical aspects of the study. Professors Benjamin Zablocki, Harriet Zuckerman, Gillian Lindt Gollin, and Joseph Fitzpatrick, S.J., gave me helpful comments.

Several of my colleagues at the University of Houston have been invaluable in critiquing the manuscript and suggesting ways of improving it. Janet Chafetz challenged me to consider the changes among Catholic nuns as part of the overall women's movement. In addition, her interest in the study and her reading of the manuscript led to some important revisions. Russell Curtis read the manuscript for its organizational implications and insisted that I emphasize the interplay of organizational and individual data. Harold A. Nelson also suggested some additions to the organizational approach. Michael Grimes and Rodolphe Charest assisted me with computer-related problems.

Jill Alsup helped me construct the organizational survey and get it mailed to religious orders. I remember that we mailed the final ones from Hell's Half Acre, Wyoming. She also assisted me with the interviewing of nuns and ex-nuns. My parents and siblings (all five of them) as well as my close friends, Barbara and Nelson Brown, were very encouraging throughout the process.

At the time the initial data were collected, I was a member of the Sisters of Divine Providence, San Antonio, Texas. The president of the order was very supportive of my research endeavors. Some of the financial support for the study was provided by Our Lady of the Lake College as well as by a small research grant from Columbia University.

By the time I met my husband in Hermann Park, I had analyzed the data and was just beginning to write the book. He and my two stepsons, Nelson and James, have a way of making life fun, even the ordeal of writing a book.
