

Acknowledgments

Many have had a part in the creation of this book. To name but a few:

Thank you to the many men and women who patiently participated in interviews with the U.S. Latino & Latina WWII Oral History Project, now called the Voces Oral History Project. This includes the interviewers, sometimes college students and other times outside volunteers. I include in this volume only a handful of the many interviews that have helped me to understand the times. I hope our interview subjects and interviewers read these accounts and will understand our request for so much detail in the interviews. A special thanks to Leo Dominguez, of Alpine, for going above and beyond, helping us find photographs and people to interview.

At the University of Texas at Austin, I am fortunate to have a large family to lean on. The Center for Mexican American Studies (CMAS) at UT-Austin provided me with a semester leave in fall 2011 to help with work on this book. CMAS also hosted a research presentation so that I could relate findings and receive responses that also helped focus my approach. To CMAS, director Dominó Perez and associate director Nicole Guidotti-Hernández, and the rest of the dedicated CMAS staff and family: thank you.

As always, thank you to my home department in journalism. Our administrative staff, particularly Janice Henderson and Lourdes Jones, responded to requests small and large in order to “make things happen” for me and for the Voces Oral History Project. And thank you to our former department chair, Glenn Frankel, who has been a committed champion of my work.

took care of all our photographic needs. Nicole Cruz, the efficient program coordinator at Voces, found herself roped into many more small chores than she should have expected when she started working with me in 2013. Thank you to these two stalwarts.

UT's Moody College of Communication, home to the School of Journalism where I teach, has shared its many resources with our project, enabling me and the Voces Oral History Project to do our work. Thank you especially to Dean Rod Hart, who has supported public symposia and conferences; R. T. Fehlhafer, in human resources; Jeff Toreki, in accounting; Jay Whitman, grants specialist. And our many, many friends on the technology team, led by Charles Soto: Scott Calhoun, Larry Horvat, Khaled Jaber, Kamran Hooshmand, Dipto Chaudhuri, David Cox, Rod Edwards, Brian Parrett, Dave Wiginton, Efraín Colón-Cabrera, Jeff Fromme, Mark Rogers, Josh Kinney, Annelle Harris, and John Kimbrough. They have provided technical advice, training, equipment check-out, and fixes. We simply couldn't do our work without them.

There have been many outside Austin who helped: Mariana Cristancho-Ahn, a master's student at the Columbia Graduate School of Journalism in the fall 2010, who visited the Ford Foundation archives in New York and download voluminous records for my use. Mary L. Holguín at the El Paso City Hall was my contact who procured for me from storage dozens of boxes with Civil Service Commission and City Council records. My brother Robert "Bobby" Rivas in El Paso has helped me by making photocopies of some El Paso municipal records. (After calling on him so many times for other research-related requests since 1999, mostly doing interviews, he now protests a bit. But he still complies.)

The librarians at Sul Ross State University in Alpine have been helpful to our project for years, especially B. J. Gallego and Melleta Bell. Many thanks for their resourcefulness and alacrity in responding to our many requests.

A few colleagues gave insightful reviews early on: Al Kauffman, now a law professor at St. Mary's Law School in San Antonio, and a former MALDEF staff attorney, read through an early version of the MALDEF chapter and made insightful suggestions. Guadalupe San Miguel, a history professor at the University of Houston, provided important recommendations that greatly improved the Alpine chapter. My former department chair, Glenn Frankel, also read selections and offered a useful critique.

UC-Santa Barbara Professor Mario T. García was kind enough to share his interviews of former El Paso Mayor Raymond Telles and Albert Armendariz with me. I must also thank him for documenting so much of Mexican American and El Paso history, thus providing the secondary resources that have made my work more doable than it would have been otherwise.

Thank you to the close reading by the publisher's reviewers, who also helped to shape this final product.

And of course, Theresa May, a dream of an editor, deserves credit for her gentle recommendations and calm and sure hand in making sure all was going according to schedule.

My husband, Gil, is my immensely patient and drama-free technical adviser at home. He knows what to do when the footnote program, or any computer function, goes awry. He also listens to me, is interested in my work, and asks good questions. Most important, his love sustains me in ways large and small.

Finally, my two teenage sons, Ramón and Agustín, long-standing volunteers, have accompanied me on research trips to Alpine and throughout the country (I personally pay their way, thank you very much). They have scanned photos, set up/taken down equipment, and helped with whatever needed to be done. My heart soars when I watch them work because I know the exciting possibilities that await them. I am reminded that those opportunities did not come easily: they were made available by the generations that have gone before. I also know that their generation must also pick up the torch, in whatever way they can. I hope we have prepared them well.
