

Acknowledgments

I first began thinking about a study of secession in Texas nine years ago. Along the way I have been helped by many people, and they have my thanks. Frank E. Vandiver encouraged and guided my early work on this topic. He has insisted that I write and publish ever since. Frederick R. Zuber must have at least once wished that I had not listened to Vandiver because, besides checking my translation of quotes from Texas German newspapers, Fred read and commented upon every version of this manuscript. Babs Willis typed and corrected many of those versions. What she did not type was typed by the secretaries in the Department of History at Texas A&M University. The staff of the University of Texas Press took that typed manuscript and made it more consistent and readable. Throughout the publication process Donald J. Pisani supported me with his friendship and advice. Publication was assisted by the United Daughters of the Confederacy. Liz Conrad deserves special thanks for her work on the maps. From time to time others have helped, and I hope they know that I appreciate their efforts.

My father was too ill to ever read what I have written, but his example of strength and courage in the face of adversity has kept me going whenever my own problems have discouraged me from continuing this project. I wish to dedicate this book to his memory.
