Acknowledgments

I WOULD LIKE to thank, first of all, Paul Bowles for his unfailing courtesy and cooperation during my visits to him in 1984 and 1986.

I would further like to thank the staff of the Harry Ransom Humanities Research Center at the University of Texas; Dave Oliphant and Tom Zigal, editors of The Library Chronicle; and the staff at the University of Texas Press.

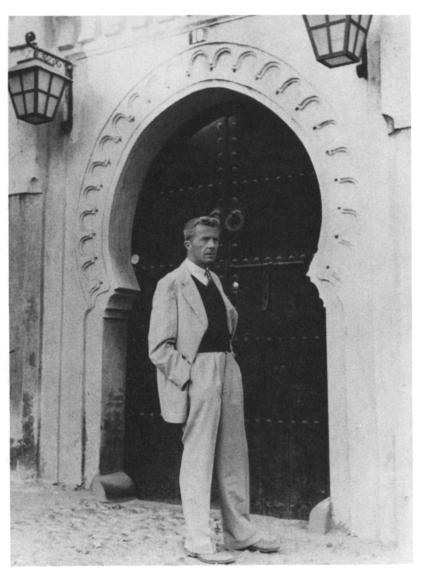

I am indebted also to Tammy Dickerson, for her patient and efficient typing; Anthony Foster, for his proofreading skill and steady friendship; my students, for their help in developing ideas as my own thinking about Bowles evolved in the classroom; and especially my mother and father for all their encouragement over the years.

Mississippi State University has been the source of much moral and still more financial support, making possible essential trips to both Austin, Texas, and Tangier, Morocco. Special thanks are due to Joseph E. Milosh, Jr., and to the English Department's Travel Committee, to Dean Edward L. McGlone of the College of Arts and Sciences, to Vice Presidents Marion T. Loftin and Ralph E. Powe of the Office of Graduate Studies and Research, to Dean Lewis R. Brown and the Academic Excellence Committee, and to Charles Lowery and the Institute for the Humanities. Additional financial assistance was provided by a Travel to Collections Grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities.

The friends who have contributed in oblique yet important ways to the completion of this book are too numerous to acknowledge individually, but two of them can hardly be omitted: Don Graham, who first told me to read Paul Bowles, and Tom Sauret, who first urged me to write about him.
