

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

All but one of the chapters in this volume were presented at a symposium 'Queen Victoria in the Colonies: Ideas, Interpretations, Interactions' convened by Maria Nugent at The Australian National University in December 2013. Our thanks to everyone who participated in that event for two days of very stimulating discussion and exchange of ideas. Unfortunately, and for various reasons, not all of the papers presented could be included. Subsequent to the symposium, Hilary Sapire accepted our invitation to contribute a chapter on South Africa, which was less well represented in the symposium programme than the other three settler colonies of New Zealand, Australia and Canada. We are indebted to her for that. We wish to acknowledge the considerable support provided by The Australian National University. In particular, our thanks to the School of History (and in particular the then head, Dr Douglas Craig) and its Australian Centre for Indigenous History (especially Professor Ann McGrath) for encouragement, funds and administrative support provided. Thanks also to the Visiting Fellows scheme in the College of Arts and Social Science at ANU, which supported Sarah Carter's participation in the symposium. Generous funding was also received from external sources, including the Australian Research Council, the Academy for the Social Sciences in Australia, and the Department of History at Monash University. Maria especially thanks Dr Blake Singley for his assistance with organising the symposium and his good humour throughout.

All of the participants responded with alacrity to the prospect of an edited collection, and we have enjoyed working with each of them on it. We were pleased when Manchester University Press accepted our proposal because we knew of its high scholarly standards and review processes, and excellent publication values. We appreciated the helpful and encouraging comments from anonymous reviewers on the proposal and manuscript. Our particular thanks to Emma Brennan for her support and for shepherding us through the publication process. In helping us prepare the manuscript for publication, we owe a debt to Dr Gretchen Albers, Calgary, Alberta, for her outstanding editorial work completed under very tight deadlines, and also to Peter Johnson who created the location maps for us. The final stages were undertaken while Maria Nugent was based at the Center for Pacific and American Studies at the University of Tokyo. Special thanks to Professor Yasuo Endo, Professor Fumiko Nishizaki and Associate Professor Kenryu Hashikawa for their hospitality and support.
